

ABSTRACT

A semiconductor device having a register and an information generation circuit can reduce data to be transferred, and consequently save electric power. The register stores first information. The information generation circuit generates, in response to a signal acquired from the exterior of the device, second information indicating which bits of the first information is to be inverted.